A century ago, African Americans were not a viable consumer market due to a variety of social, economic, political, and demographic circumstances. As the 20th century progressed, African Americans realized their growing power as consumers and attracted the attention of a variety of American corporations. Today, while annual African American consumer spending has passed the trillion dollar mark, Black consumption patterns represent spending weakness, rather than spending power.